Design and animation startup LottieFiles raises seed round from Adobe Fund for Design and 500 Startups

San Francisco, April 2020: LottieFiles, a company that aims to pave the future of animation with a powerful new file format, Lottie (which on an average is 600% smaller than a GIF) and its animation workflow platform, announced that it had raised a round of capital from Adobe Fund for Design and 500 Startups.

“LottieFiles has helped hundreds of thousands of developers and designers from over 32,000+ global fortune companies (Netflix, Disney, Airbnb, Google, ByteDance, Amazon, Grab, etc.) ship interactive animation faster and more effectively.

This has made LottieFiles one of the largest and most active communities of animators, developers, project managers, and marketers who understand the power that animation and interactive content holds in boosting user engagement and conversions,” said Kshitij Minglani, Co-Founder and CEO.

In light of recent changes in the world, a platform like LottieFiles is even more relevant as most companies are talking about digital marketing, transformation, and looking to enhance their efforts as more users come online.

When it comes to the Lottie animation, there has been widespread adoption, and it has grown organically thus far. LottieFiles plans to use the capital towards R&D efforts in making the Lottie file format even more capable and expanding its community of both individuals and medium to large companies.

“We see use-cases of Lottie animations from app loading and wait screens, to gamification, user onboarding as well as to websites and apps that want to serve meaningful content to its users,” added Nattu Adnan Co-Founder and CTO.

With its offices across San Francisco and Kuala Lumpur, and its user base spread across 60+ countries, the company is betting on the power of interactive content across platforms, across devices, and across industry verticals like marketing, gaming, productivity, media, and more.
